

Ah! Tuscany

Ah! Tuscany - the Enlightenment of an Expatriate - this new illustrated version describes the experiences of a newly retired nuclear safety engineer and his Italian born wife over a 5 year period beginning with the purchase, refurbishing and furnishing of a beautifully located apartment with an incredible view of the famous twelfth-century towered city of San Gimignano. The story quickly evolves to the bureaucracy of buying a car and recovering it after it has been stolen, obtaining citizenship and a nightmare of obtaining permission to live in Italy which continues throughout the book. Interspersed is a mosaic of personal experiences of making new friendships, travel, cycling, country walks, and the grape, olive and mushroom harvests. There are shocking stories of the medical services, money laundering, and the avoidance or payment of taxes, and heart-warming descriptions of the cultural scene, All Saints day, Christmas and New Years. Several government controlled services are described, such as utilities, banks, telephone, postal services, water, and traffic violations - that demonstrate a shocking lack of consideration for its citizens, along with observations on politics, strikes, television and the invaluable function of notaries. Interesting visits to nearby historical towns and even to the office of the mayor of San Gimignano are also included. In a special chapter on the Tuscan way of life the author attempts to explain the dichotomy of the beautiful life style and the uncaring, even thoughtless treatment of its citizens by the government and government-controlled industries. There is also a separate chapter, clearly describing the interesting history of San Gimignano and its mother city of Volterra. As the story ends, author Don McPherson and his wife regain control of their Tuscan lives, adopt to the many new customs and adjust to a
