Not illustrated. 1893 Excerpt: ...may be, he cannot raise wages, because he has to sell his goods in competition with other employers who are crowding wages down. Those who are grinding their men can undersell him every time, and he must lose his business or cut down his pay-roll. Such is the actual outcome of the unhindered working of the principle of competition. It results, no doubt, in a great cheapening of commodities, and in an equal cheapening of human life and human virtue; in the destruction of the weak, in the degradation of the ignorant, in the practical enslavement of the poor. True it is, as Professor Clark has said, that competition wholly without moral restraint has never existed. If competition were supreme, it would be supremely unmoral; if it existed otherwise than by sufferance, it would be a demon. Nothing could be wilder or fiercer than an unrestricted struggle of millions of men for gain, and nothing more irrational than to present such a struggle as a scientific ideal., 1 But though, in spite of the theories of the individualistic economists, moral forces have interposed to check, to some extent, the savagery of this struggle, yet these moral influences have been so feeble, and those who sought to wield them have so often stood abashed in the presence of that false science which sought to banish them from the industrial domain, that their work has been ineffectually done; and the demon of individualism has had free range in society, with such consequences as we have seen. Not laborers alone, but employers and capitalists as well, have found that competition, in the present state of human nature, is not an unmixed good. Not only does it crowd wages below the limit of subsistence; it also devours profits. Often by the fierceness of competition the gain...
