Excerpt: ... A N ENQUIRY Into the Behaviour of the QUEENs Last Ministry, With Relation to their Quarrels among themselves, and the Design charged upon them of altering the Succession of the Crown. June, Mjdcxv, SINCE the death of the Queen, it was reasonable enough for me to conclude, that I had done with all public affairs and speculations; Besides, the scene and station I am in, have reduced my thoughts into a narrow compass: And being wholly excluded from any view of favour under the present administration, upon that invincible reason of having been in some degree of trust and confidence with the former; I have not found the transition very difficult into a private life, for which I am better qualified both by nature and education. The The reading and enquiring after news, not being one of my diversions, having always disliked, a mixed and general conversation, which, however it fell to my lot, is now in my power to avoid; and being placed by the duties of my function at a great distance from the feat of business-f I am altogether ignorant of many common events which happen in the world: OnIy from the little I know and hear, it is manifest, that the hearts of most men are filled with doubts, fears, and jealousies, or else with hatred and rage, to a degree that there seems to be an end of all amicable commerce between people of different parties; and what the consequences of this may be, let those consider who have contributed to the causes which, I thank God, is no concern of mine. There are two points, with reference to the conduct of the late Ministry, much insisted on, and little understood by those who write or talk upon that subject; wherein I am sufficiently qualified to give satisfaction; and would gladly do it, because I see very much weight sai...
